

De Hartevel's fury turned upon his wife. "What have you to say? . . . Explain!"

The Kennel

By Maurice Level

Illustrated by Harry Townsend

A S TEN o'clock struck, M. de Hartevel emptied a last standard of beer, folded his newspaper, stretched himself, yawned, and slowly rose.

The hanging lamp cast a bright light on the tablecloth, over which were scattered piles of shot and cartridge wads. Near the fireplace, in the shadow, a woman lay back in a deep armchair.

Outside, the wind blew violently against the window, the rain beat noisily on the glass, and from time to time deep bayings came from the kennel where the hounds had struggled and strained since morning.

There were forty of them: big mustiffs with ugly fangs, stiff-haired griffons of Vendée, that flung themselves with ferocity on the wild boar on hunting-days. During the night their sullen bayings disturbed the countryside, evoking response from all the dogs in the neighborhood.

M. DE HARTEVEL lifted a curtain and looked out into the darkness of the park. The wet branches shone like steel blades; the autumn leaves were blown about like whirled and flattened against the walls. He grumbled:

"Dirty weather."

He walked a few steps, his hands in his pockets, stopped before the fireplace, and with a kick broke a half-consumed log. Red embers fell on the ashes; a flame rose, straight and pointed.

Madame de Hartevel did not move. The light of the fire played on her face, touching her hair with gold, throwing a rose glow on her pale cheeks; and, dancing about her, cast fugitive shadows on her forehead, her eyelids, her lips.

The hounds, quiet for a moment, began to growl again; and their bayings, the roaring of the wind and the hiss of the rain on the trees, made the quiet room seem warmer, the presence of the silent woman more intimate. Subconsciously this influenced M. de Hartevel. He touched his wife's shoulder:

"It is ten o'clock. Are you going to bed?"

She said "Yes" and left her chair, as if regretfully.

He hesitated, his back against the fender, and, without looking at her, asked in a low voice:

"Would you like me with you?"

"No—thank you."

Frowning, he bowed. "As you like."

His shoulders against the mantelshelf, his legs apart, he watched her go. She walked with a graceful, undulating movement, the train of her dress moving on the carpet like a little flat wave. A surge of anger stiffened his muscles.

WHEN the door had shut and the sound of steps died away in the corridor, he went to his room, lay down, took a book, and tried to read.

The rain hissed louder than ever. The wind roared in the chimney; out in the park, branches were snapping from the trees. The hounds bayed without ceasing; their howling sounded through the creaking of the trees, dominating the roar of the storm; the door of the kennel strained under their weight.

He opened the window and shouted:

"Down!"

For some seconds they were quiet. He waited. The wind that drove the rain on his face refreshed him. The barking began again. He banged his fist against the shutter, threatening:

"Quiet, you devils!"

There was a singing in his ears, a whistling, a ringing; a desire to strike, to ransack, to feel flesh quiver under his fists took possession of him. He roared. "Wait a moment!" slammed the window, seized a whip, and went out.

HE STRODE along the corridors with no thought of the sleeping house till he got near his wife's room, when he walked slowly and quietly, fearing to disturb her sleep. But a ray of light from under her door caught his lowered eyes. He listened. . . . The light went out. . . . He stood motionless and, suddenly impelled by a suspicion, he called softly:

"Marie Thérèse!"

No reply. He called louder. Curiosity, a doubt that he dared not formulate, held him breathless. He gave two sharp little taps on the door. A voice inside asked:

"Who is there?"

"I. Open the door. . . ."

A whiff of warm air laden with various perfumes and a suspicion of ether passed over his face.

The voice asked:

"What is it?"

He walked in without replying. He felt his wife standing close in front of him. Her breath was on him; the lace of her dress touched his chest. He felt in his pocket for matches. Not finding any, he ordered:

"Light the lamp!"

SHE obeyed, and as his eyes ran over the room he saw the curtains drawn closely, a shawl on the carpet, the open bed, white and very large; and in a corner, near the fireplace, a man lying across a long rest-chair, his collar unfastened, his head drooping, his arms hanging loosely, his eyes shut.

He gripped his wife's wrist:

"Ah! Then this is the reason you turn your back on me?" (Continued on page 61)

The Kennel

(Concluded from page 16)

She did not shrink from him, did not move. No shadow of fear passed over her pallid face. She only raised her head, murmuring:

"You are hurting me."

He let her go and, lending over the inert body, his fist raised, cried:

"And—what a lover! Our friend. . . . Almost a son to us."

She interrupted him:

"He is not my lover."

He burst into a laugh:

"Ah! Ah! You expect me to believe that?"

He seized the collar of the recumbent man, and lifted him up. But when he saw the livid face, the half-opened mouth showing the teeth and gums, when he felt the strange chill of the flesh that touched his hands, he started and let go. The body fell back heavily on the cushions, the forehead beating twice against a chair. His fury turned upon his wife.

"What have you to say? . . . Explain!"

"It is very simple," she said. "I was just going to bed when I heard the sound of footsteps in the corridor—uncertain steps, faltering—and a voice begging, 'Open the door . . . open the door.' I thought you might be ill. I opened the door. Then he came, or, rather, fell into the room. . . . I knew he was subject to heart-attacks. . . . I laid him there. . . . I was just going to bring you when you knocked. . . . That's all."

BENDING over the body, and apparently quite calm again, he asked, every word pronounced distinctly:

"And it does not surprise you that no one heard him come in?"

"The hounds bayed."

"And why should he come here at this hour of the night?"

She made a vague gesture.

"It does seem strange. But—I can only suppose that he felt ill and that—quite alone in his own house—he was afraid to stay there—came here to beg for help. . . . In any case, when he is better—as soon as he is able to speak—he will be able to explain."

M. de Harivel drew himself up to his full height, and looked into his wife's eyes.

HE DREW an armchair to the fire, sat down, and, his hands stretched out to the flames, continued:

"But, however simple and natural the event in itself may be, nothing can alter the fact that a man has died here during the night. . . . Is that not so?"

She hid her face in her hands and made no reply.

"And if your explanation satisfies me, I am not able to make others accept it. The servants will have their own ideas, will talk. That will be dishonor for you, for me, for my family. . . . That is not possible. We must find a way out of it—and I have already found it. . . . With the exception of you and me, no one knows, no one will ever know what has happened in this room. No one saw him come in. . . . Take the lamp and come with me."

He seized the body in his arms and ordered:

"Walk on first."

She hesitated as they went out of the door.

"What are you going to do?"

"Leave it to me. . . . Go on."

Slowly and very quietly they went toward the staircase, she holding high the lamp, its light flickering on the walls, he carefully placing his feet on stair after stair. When they got to the door that led to the garden, he said:

"Open it without a sound."

A GUST of wind made the light flare up. Beaten on by the rain, the glass burst, and fell in pieces on the threshold. She placed the extinguished lamp on the soil. They went into the park. The gravel crunched under their steps and the rain beat upon them. He asked:

"Can you see the walk? . . . Yes? . . . Then come close to me. . . . Hold the legs. The body is heavy."

They went forward in silence. M. de Harivel stopped near a low door, saying:

"Feel in my right-hand pocket. There is a key there. . . . That's it. Give it to me. Now let the legs go. . . . It is as dark as a grave. . . . Feel about till you find the key-hole. . . . Have you got it? . . . Turn."

Excited by the noise, the hounds began to bay. Madame de Harivel started back.

"You are frightened? . . . Nonsense. . . . Another turn. . . . That's it. . . . Stand out of the way."

With a thrust from his knee he pushed open the door. Believing themselves free, the hounds bounded against his legs. Pushing them back with a kick, suddenly, with one great effort, he raised the body above his head, balanced it there a moment, flung it into the kennel, and shut the door violently behind him.

BAYING at full voice, the beasts fell on their prey. A frightful death-rattle, "Help!" pierced their clamor, a terrible cry, superhuman. It was followed by violent growlings.

An ungrateful horror took possession of Madame de Harivel; a quick flash of understanding dominated her fear and, her eyes wild, she flung herself on her husband, digging her nails in his face as she shrieked:

"Fired! He wasn't dead! . . ."

M. de Harivel pushed her off with the back of his hand, and standing straight up before her, jeered:

"Did you think he was?"

SOMETHING and that barges ending her—stricken, from the house. What could it have been? Don't miss 'The Empty House,' by Maurice Level—in next month's 'Hearst's.'

The Remaking of Maggie

(Continued from page 15)

of rolling efficiency methods. Usually I'm well paid, but this time I volunteer my services. I've diagnosed you, and I want to prescribe."

Miss Knapp gasped. "Prescribe? For what? What on earth?"

During the next few minutes Joey Dunn lectured on efficiency, commercial, social, personal. When his hearer finally sensed the drift of his remarks she listened midway between tears and laughter, between anger and amusement. It was no small tribute to her character that she heard him through, for, as delicately as he could put the matter, it was anything but complimentary.

There was a queer timber to the girl's voice when she murmured finally: "Perhaps I have failed utterly as a woman, at least in your eyes, but—it's hard to forgive a man, even a dear friend, for saying so. Just out of curiosity, however, I'd like to hear your cure for this—this so-called lack of efficiency."

"It's simple enough if you analyze it as I have," Joey declared with conviction. "You give too much of yourself and you take nothing. That's your trouble, Maggie. The test of a person is the reaction he or she sets up in others—the profit he takes. You live in your own world, you never go out into the other person's world. You arouse only admiration for your own accomplishments, and your splendid character."

NOW, then, you've got to learn to arouse other people's appreciation of themselves and of their characters. You've got to learn to listen and to understand. You've got to get into the other fellow's life and take an interest in it. Then watch him respond! Why, when I first came here to see you I was dying to tell you a lot of things about myself—but I've never yet got around to it. You didn't let me. They say it is more blessed to give than to receive. Bunk! Language is full of pernicious falsehoods like that. Encourage others to give—the very best that's in them. Understand, I'm talking professionally; there is nothing personal—"

Miss Knapp burst into a trepidulous laugh. "Of course. But what shall I gain by all this? Marriage? What makes you think I want to marry?"

"Every woman does," Joey declared. "Besides, you're too splendid to be an old maid. I can make you one hundred per cent efficient, Maggie, if you'll let me. Will you permit me to—to reorganize you? Will you let me install my system, and give it a fair trial?"

"Perhaps."

"Good! I always assume that to mean yes! So we'll start right now by cutting out the giving and by teaching you how blessed it is to receive. Lockport is a town of young business concerns, and young business men, all growing. I'm going to teach you more about the world these fellows live in than they know themselves."

"And all so that I can marry some rising financial genius?"

For the life of him Joey could not determine what emotion caused the catch in Miss Knapp's voice, what accounted for the strained look about her eyes. Very professionally he said: "We'll leave the result to take care of itself. I intend to make you into a going concern."

MANY evenings with Miss Knapp followed this heart-to-heart talk, busy evenings for both expert and pupil. The last of the efficiency man was in Joey's blood and he was too deeply engrossed in his hobby to heed anything except results. He expounded, now on the advantages of the time clock as against registry sheets in factories, again upon open shops as against tightly unionized plants, or the Macy system for determining overheads. He and Maggie went to the movies, but only to see pictures of automobile manufacture, the evolution of the American locomotive, or modern methods of deep mining.

More than once the girl found her part hard to play—found little of interest in an advanced discussion of modern tendencies of collective bargaining, or the theory of the manager's compass—but she resolutely held herself to her purpose.

And she proved to be an apt pupil. Joey discovered that she had a brain, a personality, a depth of intellect which surprised even him who knew her best.

Results came in due time, and Joey rejoiced. Men began coming to the Knapp home, and they stayed longer than formerly. Maggie began to refuse invitations out, as in the old days; her evenings with Joey became more and more infrequent, and he realized that his efforts were gaining ground.

ONE day they drove over to Gary to visit the steel mills, and spent a strenuous afternoon following the ore through its butterfly changes, from the red chrysalis to the pla, then into the open-hearth furnaces, out through the dashing rolls, and on to its final structural shapes. To Joey, the mammoth plant was an inspiring example of efficiency energized. Here dwelt the god of Twentieth Century Commerce in all his naked strength and splendor; here was typified the essence of modern life.

They had dinner together, then rode home through the night, and Joey broke the news of his first big consolidation, a scheme he had been working on for some time, and the negotiations for which had arrived at a point where he would soon have to leave Lockport for the East.

Maggie listened so well, her brief comments were so much to the point, so anticipative, so intelligent, that he went into more detail than he had intended. Under the urge of her

DeMiracle

Every Woman's Depilatory

Before Your Dip

You should remove unsightly hair from any part of the exposed body with DeMiracle, because it is the safest, nicest, cleanest and easiest way to remove hair from face, neck, arms, underarms or limbs.

When you use DeMiracle there is no messy mixture to apply or wash off. It is ready for instant use and is the most economical because there is no waste. Simply wet the hair with this nice, original, sanitary liquid and it is gone.

Write for free book.

Three Sizes: 40c, $1.00, $2.00
At all toilet counters or direct from us in glass containers, on receipt of $1.00 or $2.00, which includes 10¢ p. m.

DeMiracle

Dept. Q-12, Park Ave. and 42nd St., New York

WILL labor-saving machinery become a modern Frankenstein? Read the novel view of the brilliant Italian economist—Ogilemo Ferrero. "Are We Slaves of Our Slaves?"—in Hearst's for September.

DIAMONDS

For a Few Cents a Day

SEND your name and address and we will send you our 32-page book of diamond bargains. It is the result of over 100 years' experience and shows you millions of dollars' worth of jewelry to choose from—and for as little as only a few cents a day.

No Money Down

The diamond you select will be sent with your first payment—without a penny down. Then if you do not think it magnificent enough to wear every day, send it back at our expense. If you decide to keep it, your credit is good.

8% Yearly Dividends

You are guaranteed an 8 per cent yearly increase in value on all exchanges. You can also earn a 2 per cent bonus. The book tells how.

Write Today

Send your name and address today—NOW. You will be under no obligation. You will receive our 32-page diamond book by the next mail. Don't post name and address NOW to J.M.L. & CO.

J.M.LYON & CO.

1 Maiden Lane, New York, N. Y.